Free, royalty-free images I'm a big believer in the use of freely available images for your website, because, after all, a website isn't intended to look like an advertisement. This is why I include photos on my book covers and in the sections of this book where I have included screenshots from an online demo, such as the Shopping section (Chapter 13). If you follow this rule, you'll limit the need to use stock images from third-party suppliers, and you'll limit your bandwidth costs because the images will be much smaller. You'll also avoid the delay before the images are distributed and appear on the online galleries. (The wait for royalty-free images can take days.) On the other hand, images are a huge investment, and if you're not prepared to spend money, you should consider looking for free images (for example, from Flickr) or licensed images. * * * ## Finding Images for the Web As a designer, I often use images to visually explain my concepts and to back up my prose. I use images for just about everything, but when I'm creating a website, I rely more heavily on stock images than on my own images. With every book I write, I aim to include a collection of stock images to help support the various chapters. Often I'll include one image per chapter. * * * # Sharing your photographs If you're working on a web-based project, the best place to get images is to either find them online or to have a friend scan them. When you're working on a book project, you can search websites for images, but you also have access to a large number of images to choose from in book collections. A blog or website is a good place to generate images because you've got a built-in audience. One of the most interesting things about blog images is that they have very little impact on the websites that use them (which is why I'm including them in this book). When you choose to use images from a blog, you can clearly indicate that they are used for illustration purposes only. How you proceed is up to you. What works for one person may not be right for you. * * * ## Finding Photos Online To find a range

But now it's impacting the outcome of a national election in the sports world as well. This year's Super Bowl was played in the United States of America, but the point of those hundred-billion-dollar television commercials wasn't to advertise Subway and Budweiser. It was to air ads sponsored by taxpayers. If you, or someone you know, have ever complained about the outrageous number of federal tax dollars spent on national defense, you may be interested in a recent study conducted by the nonprofit group Taxpayers for Common Sense. This nonprofit group was organized in 1975 by Ralph Nader to promote fiscal restraint in public policy. Like many other Democrats, the Democrats in Congress and President Obama, they believe that our military overspending by 200% exceeds the levels of most other industrialized nations. And their studies seem to bear that out. A breakdown of the $41 billion spent on the Super Bowl this year, shows that $9.9 billion of that amount was spent by the federal government through the
