dos. Randomized study of the effect of a passive warming mattress on clinical outcome and patient comfort during perineal labor. To determine the effect of a passive warming mattress (PWM) on the duration of labor, maternal and newborn outcomes, patient comfort, and satisfaction with maternal care at labor. This randomized controlled study was conducted in April 2000 at a tertiary perinatal center in the USA. Participants were included if they gave birth vaginally in our obstetric unit; met pre-specified criteria for active labor; had a PWM inserted within 6 h of admission; and were randomly assigned to either the intervention group or control group. One hundred and six women were randomized to the intervention group or control group. All women were managed according to standard obstetric practice at the time of study. Duration of labor and maternal and newborn outcomes were analyzed by log-rank tests, and comparisons between groups were assessed using Fisher's exact test. Patient satisfaction with labor care and maternal perception of pain with the PWM was analyzed using one-way analysis of variance. The PWM group had a significantly shorter labor duration than the control group ($P = 0.0007$). This was associated with a reduction in the number of second-stage augmentations, vacuum extractions, and cesarean sections, as well as increases in spontaneous vaginal births and no instrument-assisted deliveries. A subgroup analysis showed a positive association between the PWM group and spontaneous vaginal births, reduced cesarean section rates, and
