update the results and when to post. - Hide the interface to improve viewing experience. - Disable to make it work on a mobile device. - Use Google Analytics: logs your traffic when the server is launched. - Have its own JSON feed and update the feed in Google

Blogger. - Update it automatically when you update it. Possibly the most attended gathering of diverse thinkers, trainers, organisers and activists involved in the exercise of Public Life today was a recent “Thinkers’ Debates” meeting entitled “Who Will Govern The Internet?”. The event was organised by the Wikimedia Foundation, as one of the many working groups they host in this larger group. This meeting gathered people from a variety of movements. It included the Social Amateurs, or “black hat hackers” as they often are referred to, who gather at Wikipedia for their programming talents. It included the public-minded academics and writers, the political organizers and activists, the media analysts and strategists, the philanthropists and funders. What they all saw together was that the Media corporations that own the online networks are still reflexively for them a source of revenue and “content”, a commodity, a product, a resource, even, that needs to be collected, disposed of, consumed, controlled, taxed, sold, rented, and bought. The Media corporations still see the Internet as their primary resource to extract revenue for themselves, rather than for the content users, the network themselves, the community of workers, or to build the network. To the Media corporations, the people of the network are simply an object, a target, a market, and a pretext for the more important thing that they really need: to make sure the network behaves the way they want it to. We are
