A: This is often a problem with drivers. What you need to do is check if the DirectX 11 video driver is installed correctly. Have you been using a new monitor since this happened? Perhaps the "old" video driver has been set as the "default". Try it without the monitor and see if there's a difference. Check the following: The DirectX 9 video driver that came with the video card (if any) The DirectX 11 video driver for your video card The video driver for the monitor you are using If there's no difference, then check for any other video drivers you may have. You can download new drivers from your video card manufacturer, or if you know you have them, you can use the driver update utility that came with your video card. If you have an older video card, and a newer monitor, you can expect that you will have to switch video cards and drivers in order to get the monitor to work properly. If you don't have an older card, you can try updating your video card drivers to the latest drivers from your video card manufacturer. If you experience the problem again, you can use the DirectX video debugger that came with the video card, or if you have the option, you can also uninstall your DirectX drivers. This can be done by going to the control panel, and right-clicking on it, and choosing "Uninstall". Then right-click on the entry that says "Microsoft DirectX x.x.x.xx" and choose "Uninstall". If the video card is Win8 capable, and the monitor is Win7, you may have a problem with your video driver. You can try removing it to see if it helps, but it may be a driver problem.
