The present invention relates to surgical devices, and more particularly to an improved means of precisely and reliably retaining surgical clips to an internal tissue site prior to and during their application and subsequent removal. Surgical clips are used to clamp tissue at various sites in the human body and hold tissue in position until desired healing or other procedures have occurred. Typically, the surgeon will grasp the distal end of the clip with a grasping instrument and hold the clip in place by pulling on the clip. When the clip is applied, the ends of the arms of the clip typically do not hold the clip in place, but when the ends are pulled on, the arms will spread apart and become fixed to the tissue. Frequently, where several clips are being used, a clip can become detached from the desired site. In such instances, each clip used in the original operation must be individually retentively secured to the tissue by the application of additional clamping force, which in turn may cause tissue damage. In addition, several clips can become detached and lost during the course of a procedure, which may require the cutting out of the tissue in order to retrieve the lost clip. The present invention provides a novel means for accurately retaining surgical clips to an internal tissue site prior to and during the application of the clip and at the same time holding the retained clip in position during subsequent tissue manipulation. The invention is a unique detachable clip retainer that incorporates the tips of two pair of co-operating clips. One clip is retained to the inner surface of the detachable clip retainer by being pushed into the clip retainer. The second clip is first pushed into the retainer so that the tips of the arms of the second clip extend beyond the surface of the clip retainer, and then the first clip is driven into the retainer over the tips of the second clip to secure the clips together. Thus, the tips of the arms of the second clip cannot be pulled
