[18] have suggested that the lunar filter is itself based on a complex internal model of the moon. The model is an inverse of the model described above. Thus the lunar filter is a negative image of the lunar model. That is, as illustrated in FIG. 9 the lunar model is normalized to have a mean level of 0.0, its raw moments are normalized to unit variance, and its histograms of each of its eight color planes are normalized to unit sum. In other words the lunar model 20 is normalized to have a mean of zero and its  $8 \times 8$  matrix of raw moments is normalized to unit variance. This normalization is then applied to the corresponding  $8 \times 8$  matrix of lunar raw moments. The lunar model 20 may also be normalized in a similar manner to the model described above so that the normalized lunar model has a mean of 1.0 for all eight color planes (not shown). Then, in performing the combination of the lunar and land-based model, the two are subjected to a minus operator to subtract the land-based model from the normalized lunar model. As with the combination described above, the land-based model can also be normalized to have a mean of zero in addition to having a unit variance for each of the color planes. The normalized lunar model is then subtracted from the normalized land-based model. Again as with the combination above, the land-based model may be normalized so that the mean is 1.0 and all of the eight components of variance are unity. The result of the combination may then be the result of converting the red, green, blue, and intensity values and their variances to their natural units. Optionally, the combination of the land-based and lunar models may be implemented as just
