2000 professional 1. Innocent When you call this car “smart”, it isn’t one of those “oh-so-smart” cars like Apple or Google’s self-driving cars. It’s an acronym describing this car, called AVIC Qin: Advanced Vehicle Internet Communication (AVIC) Qin. Like most pre-smart cars, this one is not so smart. It’s just a regular car, with cruise control, self-parking, and a few safety features that make it safer for the driver. The key is the computer engine inside. This isn’t another in-car Internet-connected dashboard computer; it’s a smartphone that has been modified, using some data from the car's camera, to drive itself. Though AVIC Qin only seats four people and the extra weight in turns makes things a little more complicated, the car feels a lot like the Tesla Model S. It doesn't go as fast and it has the steering wheel instead of swiveling seats, but it has the same focus on safety. And it actually makes a lot of sense, since all of the driving is done by the computer. The driver stays in the passenger seat and only occasionally has to take over. And when something happens, there's an excellent safety record behind the car. This year the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration deemed it “one of the safest vehicles in the world,” and the AVIC Qin
