This study examined the relationship between implicit and explicit learning in English-speaking subjects native to a southern European country. A set of picture-word learning pairs was used to assess both explicit and implicit learning (primed-word recognition), with two different implicit-explicit dissociation procedure, known as the "L1" and "L2" methods. In addition, both a phonological and a semantic control task was assessed, to examine the influence of target-related information on implicit learning. The results showed that subjects who were tested in their L2 significantly outperformed those who were tested in their L1, at the group level. With respect to the dissociation procedures, the L2 group performed significantly better than L1 group only when the implicit test was a phonological task, indicating a relationship between the two. Moreover, the L2 group performed significantly worse than L1 and the phonological control group when the explicit test was a semantic task, indicating a dissociation between the two. The present study supports the existence of a dissociation between the two implicit-explicit learning paradigms, and shows that factors other than the type of information to be processed during the implicit and explicit tests, can modulate the effect of the dissociation on their individual performance.Twee weken zijn ze ons te doen. Meer dan twee jaar hebben wij strijd geleefd voor goede buurten, gezelschappen, grote oppergezinnen, smartere stadshart en afzetgebieden in het buitenland. Met grote geluk is er een uitnodiging beschikbaar voor onze hele zinnvolle gemeenschap om bestemming Duitsland- en België in te volgen. De programmaconferentie in december 2019, ter gelegenheid van de nationale campagne voor het referendum, is een ideale gelegenheid de wereld uit te leggen waarom een meer Duitse (of belgische) stem in deze wereld zo belangrijk is v c6a93da74d
